

PORTRAIT OF AN ASSHOLE

Natasha Bajc [pronounced /ba■ts/]

This work locates itself at the intersection of Technosomatic practice and Žižekian complicity, interrogating how the spectator's gaze actively constructs and sustains the structural violence of the image. Through a deliberate Warholian flattening, the subject is stripped of affective depth, forcing an immediate confrontation with the assemblage of desire, spectacle, and digital surveillance.

By inverting the traditional vectors of the male gaze, the portrait functions not as a passive object of contemplation, but as a reciprocal mirror—reflecting the viewer's own ideological positioning within the system it seeks to critique.

With gratitude to Declan James Jones for insight and advice.
